FEATURED ECONOMIC INDICATOR

Shoppers Remain Cautious

Retail sales and retail sales excluding volatile auto and gas both exceeded economists expectations in October, but the growth trend has been weak. This was highlighted over Thanksgiving weekend when retail sales dropped for the first time in at least seven years according to the National Retail Federation. The lower holiday weekend sales numbers which include retailers' crucial Black Friday sales came just after the Conference Board announced on November 26 that Consumer Confidence dipped to 70.4 in November from 71.2 the prior month. Thanksgiving weekend sales fell 2.7% from a year ago even as retailers warned that large promotions will cut into margins and customer traffic increased from the prior year both in stores and online. Consumers continue to watch for bargains and limit purchases as they feel pressure from weak employment and economic growth.

RECENT NEWS

Federal Reserve Still Sees Financial System Risks

The Federal Reserve has begun implementing capital and liquidity rules to limit financial system risks. However, many rules have not yet been implemented and the Federal Reserve has indicated that it seeks to focus more on short-term funding including repurchase agreements. Scaling back this funding source would not be easy or without market risks since so many borrowers and investors rely on repurchase agreements. The Fed is weighing the potential downside, including reducing the amount of available credit, of any actions it takes. Higher capital and margin requirements may be required in the future.
