FEATURED ECONOMIC INDICATOR

International Pressures Drive Down Inflation

Domestic inflation is falling due in part to lower oil prices. Deflation in Japan and low inflation across Europe may also be driving down U.S. inflation. The Fed appears to be focusing more beyond the U.S. as it said in its January 28th statement that "international developments" are now an important factor in its policy considerations. Generally, low inflation is considered supportive of economic growth, but when inflation is too low it can delay purchases if investors believe prices will not increase or they could decrease.

RECENT NEWS

European Union Quantitative Easing to Begin

The European Central Bank announced on January 22 that it will launch a quantitative easing program similar to the programs initiated by Japan, the U.S. and the U.K. The ECB plans to buy €60 billion in bonds per month with a total that may exceed €1 trillion ($1.16 trillion). The intent of the program is to boost investment in businesses by lowering interest rates on relatively safe assets such as government bonds. Some observers are skeptical that the plan will work because yields are already low across the Eurozone. In addition, German officials and others worry that further loosening of monetary policy will reduce pressure on politicians to make structural reforms viewed as necessary to increase growth. Nonetheless, investors are optimistic and stock markets across Europe reacted favorably to the news.
